Females of the bushbuck (Tragelaphus scriptus) were treated with a single intraperitoneal dose of either tamoxifen or toremifene (2 mg/kg body weight) to study the effect of antiestrogens on follicular dynamics and ovulation. For a period of 14 days after treatment, the females were monitored for regular oestrous cycle phases and corpus luteum formation. Ovulation occurred in all animals within 48 h after treatment with toremifene and in most animals with tamoxifen. During the follicular phase (days 1-8), the follicles regressed and the diameter of the main follicle showed a significant decline in all treated animals (P less than 0.01). However, corpora lutea were observed in some treated animals (20%). Tamoxifen treatment induced the persistence of a large antral follicle, which was significantly larger than that of controls. These findings may be interpreted as a stimulatory effect of tamoxifen on the follicular system. Serum oestrogen levels decreased in all animals during the follicular phase, suggesting a negative feedback effect on the hypothalamo-pituitary-gonadal axis. The data show that treatment with tamoxifen and toremifene can cause premature ovarian failure in the bushbuck. We propose to study two enzymes that catalyze the transfer of phosphate groups from cytosolic organophosphate to nucleoside diphosphates. One is a nuclear enzyme (N-terminal organophosphate diphosphatase) which participates in the removal of organophosphate insecticides from the site of action in the insect nervous system. The other is a mitochondrial enzyme (N-terminal organophosphate diphosphatase) which is concentrated in the mitochondrial matrix and catalyzes the release of pyrophosphate from the organophosphate pesticide nerve agent soman
