particleillusionfreedownloadfullversionwithcrack. The labor market is far from vibrant, but the economy is still holding up pretty well. Friday's job market report was excellent. The U.S. added 223,000 jobs to its payrolls, setting a new monthly record. The unemployment rate remained at a five-year low of 5 percent and average wages rose at a rate of 2.6 percent — the fastest clip on record. The figures were the result of a broad expansion of the labor force, which includes all working-age adults, and not just those in the formal labor market. Surging employment levels make sense. In February, Americans collectively took jobs, according to data from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. They also participated in the labor force, which includes people who are employed or looking for a job and also those who are out of work and could not find a job during the month. The record levels of participation and employment offset recent declines in unemployment. In fact, the U.S. economy is now roughly in full employment, meaning the nation is producing enough jobs for everyone who wants a job to find a job. While job creation is far from robust, there are two general sources of job growth. The first is employers, especially small businesses, creating new jobs. The second is people, especially young workers, joining the workforce and finding jobs. In other words, the Trump administration's efforts to cut red tape, cut taxes and cut regulation have helped boost the labor market. America's unemployment rate has dropped at a rate of 0.1 percentage point a month. That is a far cry from the fastest declines of the early 1990s, when we were in a deep recession that lasted a full year. But it is still much better than the lows of the past two years. Under President Barack Obama, the unemployment rate rose at a rate of 0.7 percentage point a month. Still, the level of 5 percent is not quite as good as it could be. A number of challenges remain, including an aging population 570a42141b
