(1) Field of the Invention The present invention relates to methods for producing gaseous hydrogen having a low concentration of organic components, and more specifically, to a method for producing gaseous hydrogen having a low concentration of organic components by catalytic hydrogenation in which organic substances in hydrogen are removed. (2) Description of the Related Art A large quantity of hydrogen is produced worldwide. Hydrogen production through steam reforming of natural gas (or natural gas) has been practiced since the early 20th century. In recent years, natural gas is expected to be a resource that is sufficient to cover the global energy needs of a mid-21st century. Hydrogen, which has a large latent heat of vaporization, can be easily and safely transported with natural gas and is expected to be very important as an energy source in this mid-21st century. Hydrogen is readily obtained through the reaction of steam and natural gas. That is, in this case, steam is heated to a high temperature and reacted with natural gas. To convert the reaction product to hydrogen, generally called "hydrogen" is produced, which is separated and purified through a hydrogenation process to obtain purified hydrogen that does not contain impurities. In addition, a method is known in which organic impurities in hydrogen are removed by a hydrogen purification device referred to as a hydrodewaxer. Hydrogen produced from natural gas generally contains hydrocarbons in a concentration of about 20%, and this concentration should be as low as possible since it 6d1f23a050
