In May of 2010, I took a trip to the Allen Keys' Art of Photography in Vancouver to commemorate the release of Lightroom 2.1. Allen Keys was one of the pioneers of digital single-lens camera photography, and he's always been a gifted teacher. On this trip, I got a taste of some of his teaching skills. Allen had us do a quick review of the images we normally took every night. My wife Laney and I were both artists and we knew that we were going to be photographing our subjects literally in the dark. That's not easy to do, so we knew we'd have to be very careful. Allen had a group of us spend a full afternoon reviewing and critiquing each others' pictures. The session started late and went on until nearly 10 pm. Allen wasn't satisfied with any of our work, or with our comments, or with our listening, but this whole process was for the benefit of the group. It was more difficult to talk the talk for someone else, to take criticism of someone else's work. I'd been an educator already for some time, but I'd never had to do anything like that before. I was definitely in my element, but my life was much more about Photoshop, Lightroom, and cataloging that this second. Once I returned from Vancouver, I got another Photoshop opportunity. Brainstorm Publishing, an Edmonton-based company, had asked if I would be interested in writing a chapter for their book titled Art of Photography: Digital, Hauling Stones. The book was to be published in fall 2011, and the publisher was looking for people like me to contribute chapters so that the book would be varied, rather than too focused on one topic. I emailed back, "Sure!" My first day on the job, I submitted my chapter, which the publisher accepted.
